Excerpt: . . . using 20 effluent as the high concentration and a dilu-reproduction, and survival. The no effect level (the NOEC), tion factor of 0. 7, the concentrations to test would be 7 , and the effect concentration (the lowest observed effect 1 O , 14 , and 20 . If the NOEC (from historical data) is concentration (LOEC)) are determined using the statisti-4050 (or above 50), then the concentration series to cal approach of hypothesis testing to determine a statisti-test might be either 25 , 50 , 75 , and 100 or 40 , cally significant response difference between a control 60 , 80 , and 100 . Choice of dilution factor and test group and a treatment group. The NOEC LOEC are heavily concentration range is a matter of judgement and de-affected by choice of test concentrations and test design pends on precision required and practicality. (see Phase I; EPA, 1992). The linear interpolation method (EPA, 1993B) provides a point estimate of the effluent After conducting Phase I procedures on an efflu-concentration that causes a given percent reduction based ent sample, the amount of effluent available for subse-on organism response. To calculate the inhibition concen-quent identification work can be sufficiently reduced so tration percentage (ICp), a computer program (Norberg-that it may be impractical to try to conduct each step as King, 1993; DeGraeve et al. , 1988; EPA, 1989C) is described in this manual. This is most likely to be a available and the assumptions for the method are not the concern for the non-polar organic identification...
