I.--On the Arrangement of Mineral Collections. The notice, in your Number for January, of a new system of Mineralogy, c. by Professor Thomson, will excite the attention of your readers: and I wish to profit by the occasion, to examine the relative advantages of the chemical and natural arrangement of mineral collections. My own experience, such as it is, has led to the preference of the latter mode; and the object of this paper will be, to give, in very general terms, the reasons for that preference: reserving details for a more advanced stage of the discussion, into which I wish to draw either Professor Thomson, or one of his qualified pupils who may have more time to spare. In the case of private collections, there...
