Lord and Lady Mount Alton had gone with their daughter to the Goodwood races, and Lyffton was with a friend cruising off the French coast in his yacht. Meanwhile the Stangraves were staying at a little seaside village in Brittany, where they had taken a country house near the Chateau de Ronceveaux, where lived some relatives of Lady Margaret. The village was a simple out-of-the-way place, standing in the shelter of a curving bay, girt with gray weather-stained cliffs; a quiet place, where the men spread the sails of their boats, and plied their oars day after day; where the women sat on their door-steps mending nets and spinning, or else stood gossiping round the well. Many would have felt very dull there; but Agnes did not. She had the companionship of the...
