Excerpt: . . . burning sun had affected the health of Coeur-de-Lion. Disquieting news came from his dominions. He concluded a truce with Saladin, giving up Ascalon to him, but keeping Jaffa, Tyre, and the fortresses along the coast, and promising to refrain from any hostilities during a period of three years, three months, three weeks, three days, and three hours. Then I will come back, said Richard, with double the number of men that I now possess, and will reconquer Jerusalem. Saladin smiled, acknowledging, however, that if the Holy City was to fall into the hands of the Christians, no one was more worthy of conquering it than Malek-Rik. The two adversaries had conceived for each other a feeling of chivalrous admiration and esteem which is the theme of Sir Walter Scott's novel The Talisman. Numerous presents had been exchanged by them during the war; and when Richard was suffering from fever, and was perishing with thirst, he received each day fruits and cooling drinks which were sent to him by the sultan. It was on the 9th of October, 1192, that Richard Coeur-de-Lion left Palestine. Standing upon the poop of his ship, he was surveying the shore, then fading from sight. Oh! Holy Land, cried he, I leave you to God, as well as your people. May He help me to come back to your assistance! The English ships were sailing together, when a storm arose and dispersed them. The one which carried the two queens...
