Excerpt: . . . its true structure--a resinous woody stem with innumerable twigs branching as from the center of a globe and carrying leaves, buds, and flowers near their end. The habit of yareta is typical of a large number of plants in the Puna. They are adapted to resist the rigors of the climate. For the most part cushion-shaped or formed in rosettes, they crouch on the ground, their outer armor of close-packed leaves acting as a protection against wind. Buds are sheltered from hail by being embedded in the armor; likewise the small flowers, of which many open only in sunshine. After snow or rain the plant is like a sponge, retaining the moisture in face of the strong daily evaporation and absorbing it by the leaves. 3 Even the large shrubs which occupy stream margins, etc. , are gnarled and twisted as is the August Weberbauer, op. cit. , p. 201. Fig. 27--Ichu grass (Stipa ichu) in the Puna Brava zone. The sheltered and slightly moister hollow has been selected as the site for a corral for llamas and a shepherd's hut. tree of the Puna, the quenua. Moreover the small leaves of the latter are leathery above and silky underneath--a sure sign that it keeps as much as it can of the available moisture. The quenua, which occurs singly or in groups, provides the only native timber and consequently is mainly found far from the haunts of man. Various reports seem to indicate that considerable...
